The International Olympic Committee (IOC) has established special rules to banning drugs to enhance performance since 1960. However, some athletes are experimenting with new drugs that are difficult to detect. The IOC forbids athletes from using steroids as strength builders. The most popular steroids are man-made forms of testosterone, a hormone already present in the body.

Another popular performance-enhancer is EPO. EPO, or erythropoietin, promotes red-blood cell production. These cells deliver oxygen throughout the body. The oxygen boost it provides can improve an athlete’s performance in a twenty-minute run by thirty seconds. In a marathon, it could give an athlete a four-minute advantage. EPO is dangerous because it can make the blood too thick for the heart to pump.

Human growth hormone (HGH), a third commonly used enhancer, is a naturally occurring amino acid which helps control growth from birth to adulthood. Genetically engineered HGH became available in 1985. Athletes use HGH to develop bigger muscles and then take steroids to strengthen the muscles. The drug is hard to detect because it passes out of the body in less than forty-five minutes.

The newest wave of performance enhancement is through a blood substitute called Hemopure. The effect of using Hemopure is similar to the effect of EPO. However, there is no current test that can detect Hemopure in the blood.

In business publications, lists like “The Best Companies to Work For” always attract a lot of attention. People enjoy reading these lists because they want to know how their own company compares to others. Or they want to clarify the reasons why they like—or dislike—their own workplaces.

What makes a company attractive to employees? Surveys show that the companies high on lists of the best employers have a few things in common apart from good salaries and generous benefits. One of these is that they allow their employees to work with colleagues that they like and get along with. Great employers don’t just hire the most talented people; they make sure that their employees are also professional, courteous, and cooperative. This is important, because it only takes one team member with an unpleasant personality to make life miserable for everyone in the office.

Great employers also constantly create chances for their people to excel. This require managers who are good at observing and communicating with their staff. Such individual attention is necessary in order to match workers with projects that will use their skills while also providing challenges.

But the most important aspect of a great employer is a little harder to define—it is a strong and positive corporate culture. The culture includes ethics. People want to work for a company that values excellence, honesty, and fairness, from the CEO down. Another part of a strong culture is an atmosphere of support; employees must feel that arrangement cares about them and wants them to succeed.
