Questions 1 to 5 refer to the following passage

Frank Abagnale started his career as a criminal in New York in the 1960s. He was just a teenager, but he looked much older. When Abagnale was just 16, he created his identity as an airline pilot by putting on the uniform of a pilot and using a fake ID. He never actually flew a plane, but he got on over 250 flights. He could stay at hotels all over the world without paying for his room or meals because the hotel charged the fees to the airline.

Abagnale opened accounts at different banks. Then he bought things in stores and paid for them with checks from these accounts. The accounts didn't have enough money in them to cover the checks, but the stores didn't know this. By the time they realized it, Abagnale was using a different bank. Abagnale was so smart that he taught himself to forge fake checks and cashed them. In addition, he typed his own account number on some deposit slips of a bank and put them back to the counter of the bank. When bank customers used the deposit slips Abagnale made, their money went into his account.

Sometimes Abagnale had to change identities so that the police would not catch him. Once he pretended to be a doctor and even worked at a hospital in Atlanta. By the time he was 21, Abagnale's face was on "Most Wanted" posters in 26 different countries. Someone recognized him in France and called the police. At his trial in the U.S., he got 12 years in prison. However, Abagnale was a prisoner for only five years. He was released for good behavior, but he had trouble finding a good job because of his criminal records. He finally went to a bank and offered to teach the bank workers about different kinds of fraud. They learned a lot from him and Abagnale started his new career as a fraud expert. After all, he knows both sides of the business.

1. How did Abagnale steal money from other people?
 - (A) He stole their paychecks.
 - (B) He transferred money out of some people's bank accounts.
 - (C) He put his account number on deposit slips at the bank.
